It seems to me that a civilised society would have a legal provision that would enable a very ill person who has no hope of recovering and is either in great pain or discomfort or faces a very bleak and distressing future that they would wish to avoid, then a quick, medically assisted form of legal euthanasia should be available to them, if they should chose to go with that course of action. Of course there will be naysayers to this, but any legislated course can be relegated should serious criticism of the provisions be justified to make the legislation as compassionate and yet as workable as possible, for those that choose it.

Sane and responsible people should have the freedom to have Euthanasia legislation on the lawbooks to be appropriately used in compelling circumstances.
