
I'm a 49 year old Australian woman.

About 18 years ago I was diagnosed with both cancer and a very rare and serious neurological disease (a form of dementia) that basically turned my world upside down. I went from being a very happy, energetic and career driven woman with a Masters Degree and in charge of the accounting department of a multi-billion dollar corporation, to someone who is now almost housebound, suffering untreatable horrific chronic pain, horrendous fatigue, constant 24/7 hunger and thirst, very poor memory and a myriad of other problems (20 of them, all-in-all). Because of the two diagnoses that I've already had, I'm at a significantly higher risk of getting a cancer recurrence, I'm at a high risk of having a stroke, and at a higher risk of a recurrence of dementia.

For many, many years I lived in fear of my future. Fear of the high risk of a horrendous and painful death since up to 15% of terminal cancer pain cannot be controlled satisfactorily. Fear of the personal degradation I would feel should I be a living corpse with unending hunger and red, raw skin from incontinence, after having a stroke or dementia recurrence. I even went online and searched around the different suicide sites and, quite literally, printed off a myriad of pages. Pages to put my mind at ease. I don't even know if these sites were reliable and correct. It never occurred to me at the time to question the validity and accuracy of them all. I just wanted something to calm my fears.

But that was all before I heard of the existence of voluntary euthanasia (VE), the various VE state societies, EXIT International and Philip Nitschke.

Hearing about the existence of something like "voluntary euthanasia" has eliminated all my fears about a potentially horrific future. It has, quite literally, injected "life" back into my life and I'm happy making the most of today without even having to think of and worry about an unknown and horrendous tomorrow.

And I'm VERY proud to say that my whole coping strategy and attitude has been highly commended by a psychologist at a very reputable Pain Clinic here in Sydney. But the best thing he said was that my support of voluntary euthanasia was very understandable given my situation. He could not find any fault in the way I lived or thought. And over 80% of Australians agree with me. Over 80% of Australians believe that VOLUNTARY euthanasia should be legalised. Pity the 3 elderly Australians that commit suicide each week in the face of painful suffering (and this is a very conservative estimate, as most suicides do not get acknowledged as such). For this alone I implore you to "legislate to regulate".

And talking of old age -

Did you know that optimism and effective coping mechanisms are more important to successful aging than physical health? In short - attitude has the greatest effect and is the best indicator of successful aging. And as I've mentioned, my whole attitude toward aging and my future is totally stress-free, calm and happy. Despite the horrendous odds of a cancer recurrence. In light of my increased risk of dementia or of having a stroke.

And by legalising the act of VOLUNTARY euthanasia you will not be increasing the number of Australians being given drugs with the specific intention of hastening their death. This is already happening. In one study 36% of surgeons have admitted to giving doses of medication greater than those required to relieve symptoms with the intention of "hastening death" (1) Yet in 2006 in Oregon, where voluntary euthanasia is legal, only 30 people died utilising the legislation. Only 3-0.

In summary, euthanasia is an act of mercy and a manifestation of control. Dying without suffering is a benchmark of a civilised society.
