

Media from The Age 18/3/2022

<https://www.smh.com.au/environment/conservation/fearful-swans-abandon-their-nests-at-start-of-duck-shooting-season-20220318-p5a5yd.html>

This was published 1 year ago

Fearful swans abandon their nests at start of duck-shooting season

By Miki Perkins and Rachel Eddie

March 18, 2022 — 6.27pm

Black swans have abandoned their eggs after being scared away by the sound of gunshots on the opening day of Victoria's duck-hunting season.

Animal rescuers who have been working at Lake Bael Bael, near Kerang in the state's north, say the parents had flown from at least six black swan nests, leaving their eggs behind.

Wildlife rescuers at Lake Bael Bael near Kerang, in Victoria, say gunshots have frightened black swans and forced them to abandon five or six nests.

One of the abandoned black swan nests at Lake Bael Bael, near Kerang.

Wildlife rescuers at Lake Bael Bael near Kerang, in Victoria, say gunshots have frightened black swans and forced them to abandon five or six nests.

Wildlife Victoria, which has had a presence at Lake Bael Bael treating injured birds, has made a complaint about the swan disturbance to the Game Management Authority.

On Friday afternoon, the Coalition Against Duck Shooting lost an eleventh-hour Federal Court bid to halt the opening weekend of the hunting season.

Also this week, two blue-winged shoveler ducks and one hardhead duck – all endangered species – were either killed by hunters or had to be euthanised.

Bird rescue volunteer Gavin, who did not want to use his surname for professional reasons, said before the duck hunting season began on Wednesday he saw swans sitting on the nests at Lake Bael Bael.

An endangered blue-winged shoveler duck- being examined by a Wildlife Victoria vet. It was later euthanised.

But when he went back on Wednesday morning, there were about 15 hunters in the same area of reeds as some nests, and the swans had flown.

“I went down to have a look when I could and all the nests were empty,” he said.

“We saw one parent circling over where the nests were and calling, frantic, she looked stressed. She did come down, but the shooters ended up entering the water not long after, and she took off.”

Wildlife rescuers said the eggs in one nest had been scattered into the water.

One of the abandoned black swan nests at Lake Bael Bael, near Kerang.

Lisa Palma, chief executive of Wildlife Victoria, said her organisation had sought expert advice on the nest abandonment, and were advised that after a few hours without a parent sitting on the nest, there was a high likelihood the swan eggs would be unviable. Black Swans are not an endangered species.

“There are multiple bird species at this wetland and with the duck season we’ve observed birds taking off in fright every day when the guns go off in the morning,” Ms Palma said.

“We are concerned because other species of birds are at the site which are threatened species.”

A total of 19 ducks have been treated at Wildlife Victoria’s veterinary tent since Wednesday. Although it is against the law to shoot birds and leave them, lead vet Dr Natasha Bassett has seen birds each day that have been left to die. The majority showed shotgun pellets inside their bodies.

Earlier this week, Premier Daniel Andrews resisted calls to end duck hunting and urged hunters to follow the rules.

“Some of us play golf. Some people go shooting. That’s a choice they are free to make, but there are rules and I do see some reports the rules seem to have been broken,” he said on Thursday.

Justice Helen Rofe dismissed the interim injunction filed by the Coalition Against Duck Shooting on Friday afternoon.

The Game Management Authority, Environment Minister Lily D'Ambrosio and Agriculture Minister Mary-Anne Thomas were named in the failed application.

Jo Soren, for the coalition, argued the authority and ministers were in breach of Commonwealth environment and conservation laws by allowing the full 90-day game season to go ahead.

She said waterbird species had not recovered from the recent drought, and birds that were not shot were still displaced from critical habitat and could be traumatised by the noise of gun shots: "The birds don't get a chance to bounce back."

---

Facebook post from Wildlife Victoria, March 19th 2022

<https://www.facebook.com/watch/?v=499129454988205>

Yesterday we let you know of a number of abandoned Swan nests with eggs, abandoned by parents who took off in fright at the sound of gunshots at duck hunting season. Here is a survivor. This beautiful little cygnet was found by a wildlife rescuer at the Kerang wetlands this morning. Estimated at only a few weeks old the lone little one was found weak, disoriented and calling out for its parents. Who, sadly, were gone.

The little one was rushed straight to the Wildlife Victoria in field veterinary triage facility where Dr Tash examined the terrified and weak baby. The cygnet, young and weak, but with no life-threatening injuries, has gone into care with compassionate Wildlife Victoria volunteer Tania, a licensed wildlife rehabilitator. Great teamwork for this precious cygnet.