Animal rights activism serves a valuable function by holding animal agriculturalists to account for their treatment of animals.
Animal agriculture, particularly intensive farming, is largely carried out behind closed doors and with little oversight by the authorities responsible for animal welfare.
The general public have the right and the desire to see how their food is produced.
If the conditions within farms and facilities were acceptable farmers would not need to hide.
Current trespass and property laws are sufficient to protect business interests.
