According to law, if someone enters a private property while there are people present and unlawfully removes property that does not belong to them is brought before the courts on a charge of aggravated burglary. Why then, can a group of people, illegally enter a property while the occupants are present and steal livestock? Same charge and should receive the same penalties, not a $1 fine. If I walked into Harvey Norman, picked up a television and walked out, I guarantee you I would get more than a $1 fine. If a person entered an animal activists home and stole their pets, wow, there would be an uproar. Farmers are providing our country with food and work seriously hard to do so. They deserve to be protected just like any other business or personal household. Without our farmers, who knows what the quality of the overseas meat and milk products would be.
