I believe the animal activists are exposing the sad truth of animals in farming. Practices used and overcrowding that is exposed enables people to be given a choice in the food they eat, where it comes from and most importantly the life of the animal. All too many businesses these days are concerned only about the bottom dollar and how much profit they can make without giving a thought about the suffering they may bring to animals and the environment. This has to change and I applaud those who have opened my eyes to things I was not aware of which in turn has allowed me to make kinder choices. Not being an activist I appreciate what they have done and hopefully they will continue to do. If the farms exposed were operating in a different manner they would not be getting upset nor would they have anything to hide. The Victorian government should be taking a good long hard look at the practices involved and think to themselves is this the legacy I want to leave for future generations?
