I support animal activists entering properties to expose cruelty to animals. Farmers portray themselves to consumers as raising animals kindly and often use clearly false advertising to reassure the public that they are purchasing animal products that have been ethically and kindly raised. Activists do not go onto properties unless they are reasonably certain that animals are being treated poorly. They should be given whistleblower protection. The public has a right to know what they are buying. We must also ensure that animals are being treated with the highest level of compassion and kindness, they are not 'things' they are sentient creatures. Animal welfare is a growing concern, community standards demand animals are treated well.
