The proposal to extend the free tram zone has my full backing, and supports the aims of State and Local government to reduce vehicle congestion in the inner city.

Any measures which make public transport more attractive, will reduce the number of people choosing to drive into the city.

In particular, extending the zone to include public facilities and universities, such as the Parkville hospital precinct, the National Gallery of Victoria, and The University of Melbourne (Parkville, and Southbank), as well as providing connections to the new Parkville Metro Rail station, will multiply the benefits, and help create a culture of getting around without cars.
