Consider that students like me do not earn significantly enough yet to pay regular utility costs in Australia. Public transport costs are one of the biggest burdens, and making students have a worse burden on public transport compared to regular employees (taking to account their earnings) is just not right. Students should be given more incentives (such as free trams to the network) for giving a large amount to universities, which clearly are already of big help to Australia's economy. To make them pay even more just for public transport is like saying that the large amount these students pay for university is not good enough.
