I have deep concerns regards the RSPCA and their ability to preform their roll as protectors of all animals Great & Small.

I fear it's not only a lack of funding & resources but also the culture within the organisation that requires change.

The RSPCA have numerous publicly repotted incidents that question their ability to fulfill the job at hand. The horrible instance of the starved horses came immediately to mind. TThey had been reported to the rspca on other occasions and nothing was done. Also on the dog & cat issue many dogs & cats are euthanised without proper assessment. Why because it's the wrong size or colour, because it's not as saleable as the small white fluffy whom just needs a bath. How can they protect with such narrow minds as this. I remember talking to someone who was once a vet for the RSPCA and they couldn't wait to get out of there and had said some of their instructions would curl your toes.
