

The number of tests undertaken in Victoria peaked in the second week of May and was then wound back in fits and starts until well into the second week of June. It wasn't until the end of June that it regained its earlier levels.

In NSW also, the foot was taken off the testing accelerator over much of this period.

But in the case of NSW, the early-warning signs were not pointing to the need for more tests.

In Victoria, by way of stark contrast, by late June when the number of Victorian tests was back at the sorts of levels seen in early May, the COVID cat was well and truly out of the bag and the second Australian wave was gathering pace.
